

Andalusian Game Reserves and Public Forests

Some facts:

- Cazorla y Segura Andalusian Game Reserve: 68.615 ha
- Serranía de Ronda A.G.R.: 29.754 ha
- Sierras de Tejeda y Almijara A.G.R.: 20.786 ha
- Cortes de la Frontera A.G.R.: 12.306 ha
- Sierras de Segura y Campos de Hernán Pelea: 19.738 ha
- Alcornocales: 10.165 ha
- Sierra de Filabres: 21.412 ha
- Species: Iberian ibex, roe deer, red deer, wild boar, fallow deer and mouflon

Further information

(+0034) 902 525 100

www.agenciamedioambienteyagua.es

Stalking

in Andalusia

Mountain stalking
in the Spanish Betic mountain range

More than 1,800 km² of huntable land

Agencia de Medio Ambiente y Agua
CONSEJERÍA DE AGRICULTURA, PESCA Y MEDIO AMBIENTE

Stalking

in Andalusia

Mountain stalking in the Spanish Betic mountain range

The Betic range network in southern Spain, due to its latitude, climatic variety and strategic position on two seas, has a unique diversity and a hunting potential that make it mandatory for any self-respecting hunter. The mountain goat is the star species, but there is also a wide range of roe deer, red deer, fallow deer, mouflon and wild boar.

Stalking the Iberian ibex

The Iberian ibex is the most valued trophy that can be won in Europe, not only for its beauty and difficulty, but because it is endemic to Iberia. More than half of the world population of the species lives in Andalusia, and this is where the specimens with the most genetic diversity are found. In addition, the Ronda Iberian ibex, exclusive to the Reserve with the same name, is one of three recognised by the SCI to establish the categories of trophy records. It is definitely a great hunting destination.

Large males are hidden in the most inaccessible areas of the rugged mountains, which makes stalking them as difficult as it is exciting and fulfilling. The game rangers, with excellent knowledge of the area, will accompany the hunter and guide him to choose the best trophy, always surrounded by attractive mountain landscapes.

To enjoy...

Cuisine

Excellent ham sausages, cheeses, game meats and stews can be enjoyed in any mountain restaurant, always accompanied by fine vegetables and a typical touch of aromatic herbs. However, every place has its typical dishes that should not be missed, such as migas (sauteed breadcrumbs with bacon) and pipirrana de Cazorla (salad with onion, tomato and cucumber), rabbit and Ronda cochifrito (sauté of lamb with lemon and garlic) or gachas (vetch purée) and almond meatballs from Filabres.

Culture

The long Moorish occupation marked all the cultural aspects of these areas, from construction and civil works to their own geographical names, passing through the cuisine and art forms. Natural diversity is also reflected in the rich cultural offering, always enriched by the great hospitality of the Andalusians.

Landscape

The Andalusian mountains are a source of biodiversity and extremely varied landscape, with mountains from sea level to the highest in the Iberian Peninsula. Proof of this is that one of the rainiest mountain ranges in Spain, the Sierra de Grazalema with 2,200 mm, is found among them as well as one of the most barren, the Sierra de Filabres, where in certain years less than 200 mm of precipitation is recorded, and both are inhabited by the mountain goat, which providing it has rough terrain to shelter in can adapt to almost any weather.

